Business leaders and executives should actively play their part in the future of young people and invest in schools that are struggling with resources according to General Manager Stakeholder Relations at Brand South Africa, Mpsuni Mubana stated when addressing a session held in partnership with Partners for Possibility in Potokwane last Tuesday.

The session aimed at finding creative solutions to the education challenges in the country and Mubana pointed out that many schools notionwide are still constrained by historical elements and legacies such as dilapidated infrastructures.

"There is a need for financial investment in these schools and that is why we are calling business leaders to come on board because government alone can't do it. We also need to support both principals and school development to improve the quality of education provided for learners, and thus to improve the educational outcomes," Mubana said.

"It is through these partnerships that we emphasise the importance of active citizenship towards the improvement of the South African education system as one of the catalysts to help the country realise Vision 2030. Brand South Africa is pleased that Partners for Possibility works with school principals and business leaders in bringing about systemic and durable change in the level of education for our young people in order to better the Nation and its global competitiveness," Mubana added.
